

PLANT STRUCTURE AND FUNCTION:

TOPIC ONE: TROPISMS

- It is the growth of the plant in a specific direction in response to unilateral stimulus.
- Stimuli include light, gravity, chemicals, water and touch.
- When part of plant grows towards stimulus it is called positive tropism.
- When movement or growth of plant is away from stimulus is called negative tropism.

TYPES OF TROPISMS

They are categorized according to type of stimulus to which the plants respond:

- a. Phototropism
- b. Hydrotropism
- c. Gravitropism/geotropism
- d. Chemotropism
- e. Thigmotropism

PHOTOTROPISM

- Plant growth response in relation to the direction of light
- When part of the plant grows towards light, for example shoots of green plants, it is called positive phototropism
- When part of the plant grows away from light for example roots it is called negative phototropism.
- Since light is necessary condition for photosynthesis, it is important that shoots of green plants which bear leaves for plant should grow towards light.

GRAVITOTROPISM/GEOTROPISM

- Plant growth response in relation to the direction of gravity.
- The newly germinated seedling placed horizontally in the dark for whole night will have its shoot bends upwards while its root bends downwards.

- When part of plant grows towards gravity it is said to be positive geotropic while if it grows away from gravity is called negative geotropism.

HYDROTROPISM.

- This is when the part of the plant grows in a specific direction in response to water/moisture.
- In plants such as willow trees, roots grow towards water. This is called positive hydrotropism.

ADVANTAGES OF TROPIC RESPONSES.

- a. Positive phototropism in shoots
It helps the shoot to bring its leaves into the best position for photosynthesis.
It helps the flowers to be exposed to insects which help in pollination which results into seeds.
- b. Negative geotropism in shoots
Since plant grows vertically, the flowers and leaves are lifted above the ground and helps the plant to compete for light and carbon dioxide.
Plant flowers may be easily pollinated by insects or wind.
It also makes seed dispersal more effective.
- c. Positive geotropism in roots
Helps the roots of plant to penetrate the soil which is their means of anchorage and their source of water and mineral salts.
- d. Diageotropism
Lateral roots are not positively geotropic: they grow at right angles or slightly downwards from the main root. This is called diageotropism.
This enables lateral roots to exploit larger volume of soil and helps to anchor the plants securely.
