Tim Brendle, 2025 Leadership in nursing is not a role many set out to achieve when they begin their careers. For most nursing professionals the initial focus is on patient care those vital immediate moments that define the essence of the profession. Yet as time passes nurses often find themselves drawn into roles that require more than clinical expertise and much more than bedside manners. They are asked to manage teams, implement policies and make decisions that impact not only individual patients but entire units and sometimes entire organizations. This natural evolution can present itself as both a challenge and an opportunity. It's no secret that healthcare systems around the world are at a crossroads. Recent shortages in staffing, the rapid advancement of medical technologies and growing patient populations demand leaders who can navigate these complexities with confidence and foresight. For nurses this means stepping out of their comfort zones and into a world where their voices and decisions carry weight far beyond the bedside. Consider this: how often are the best bedside nurses unexpectedly tapped for leadership roles without formal preparation? It's a scenario many in the profession can relate to. While every nurse's journey is unique, many share a common starting point: an unforeseen opportunity. For me, the path to leadership began with a simple request. Like many nurse managers, I found that excelling at my job meant being entrusted with special projects and additional responsibilities. One day, my director called me into the office and asked if I would step in as the interim manager until a replacement could be found. Five years later, I was still the manager. This story resonates because it reflects a fundamental truth in nursing: the transition into leadership is often unplanned and the resources to succeed are rarely handed to you. While ambition and drive are vital, leadership cannot be rushed, particularly in healthcare. Millennials and Gen Z nurses often value purpose, flexibility, and innovation qualities that make them uniquely suited for leadership. Nursing Times, Nursing Mirror, 2007 Hospital Literature Index, 1993 The
