Instagram Accounts Matter, 2021 Adolescents' Social Comparison on Instagram Kaitlyn Burnell, 2020

Nearly three quarters of adolescents report using Instagram, raising concerns about how they are interacting with this social media platform. This study investigated a) how adolescents visually attend to Instagram posts pulled from their Instagram feeds, b) what types of content adolescents are following on Instagram, and c) how they report experiencing this content, especially in terms of social comparison and self-esteem and self-perceptions.

Immediately influenced after browsing this content and how individual differences may moderate these relations. Participants included 57 early to middle adolescents (ages 12–17) and 154 late adolescents (ages 18 and 19). Adolescents browsed a sample of Instagram posts pulled from their Instagram feeds using eye tracking technology and completed surveys assessing their personality well being and body image as well as their experiences with each post that they browsed. These posts were also observationally coded for content. Results suggest that for much of the time adolescents are not visually fixating on features of Instagram posts believed to be relevant to adolescent development i.e. the likes. The content followed was quite diverse with a significant portion coded as peer content. Celebrities and athletes as well as text based images and memes also were common fixtures. Moreover this content tended to be positively biased. Participants did not typically report adverse reactions after viewing each given post and instead reported rather positive emotional responses when viewing. There were also contradictory effects on their state self esteem and self perceptions. Although individual differences were associated with participants self reported responses to viewing the posts there was little evidence that these traits moderated effects on state self esteem and self perceptions. Age was generally not associated with key variables. Findings suggest that adolescents' Instagram experiences are quite diverse and are discussed in consideration with the implications for overall well being.
