Dear Ms. Swindoll,

The findings in this study, for the most part, support previous research on the effects of the 1996 welfare reform on the employment of welfare recipients. The study found that the 1996 welfare reform had a positive effect on the employment of welfare recipients, and that the effect was larger for those who were employed before the reform. The study also found that the effect was larger for those who were employed before the reform and who were also employed after the reform. The study also found that the effect was larger for those who were employed before the reform and who were also employed after the reform.
