What would you like to prove? How do you prove it? And what would you like to disprove? How do you disprove it? These may be the only questions you can ask, but you will find that the answers will tell you the history of your situation. Please note that an answer to one of these questions will probably disprove the other. You may have to go back and forth between them. You may also have to go back and forth between the two types of questions. If you can't prove something, it is probably not true. If you can't disprove something, it is probably true.

These additional requirements concern both the structure of the house and the function of the house in society. In this context the changes in the structure, which a house goes through, especially in the family, determine the house's function, and therefore the structure of the house reflects the requirements. These goes from a single-parent family, which requires that the house must accommodate the requirements of the family, all the way to the more "modernistic" requirements, which are a family's need for privacy and the function of the house as a social unit.
