BRAINLAB

BUZZ - DIGITAL OR WHITEPAPER

Modern operating rooms (ORs) are equipped with a variety of technical systems. Ever-increasing preoperative diagnostic data, and safety and documentation requirements of OR procedures, have significantly raised the amount and complexity of information and devices used in the OR. Furthermore, the implementation of device integration in the OR is undergoing a radical change towards a modern and future-proof IP-networked infrastructure. The new Buzz system by Brainlab is based on a computer- and IP-based architecture, which meets also complex customer requirements and combines a workflow-oriented user concept with a state-of-the-art user interface.

What is important for the user in the OR?

Users need to both access medically relevant data (e.g. preoperative computer-aided tomography image data) and control the OR infrastructure, in order to increase their efficiency, and because they will be used by a variety of users, the complexity of the underlying integration systems must be reduced to an intuitive, uniform interface using clear and intuitive operational controls to streamline the OR workflow.

Ideally everything in the OR will occur in the context of the patient being treated, with patient information automatically stored in a computer system so that multiple recurring steps can be semi-automated throughout the OR process. Surgeons or care personnel must be able to access the following information and functions during a procedure:

- Data from the hospital information system (HIS): patient metadata, planned interventions etc.
- Access to and presentation of radiological image data from the radiological image archive system (PACS).
- Intelligent software algorithms providing support for information analysis and enriching raw data.
- Central control of signals and displays of live video data (endoscope, microscope, navigation etc.) on all screens in the OR.
- Situation-dependent control of OR infrastructure (light, audio etc.).
- Use of communication resources (streaming, video conferencing, telephony).

- Tools for documenting procedures (video recordings, screenshots) and archiving records.

The challenge is to intelligently combine both the medical needs of the OR, which are sometimes subject to strict national regulation, and additional infrastructure functions, which are often adjusted to particular individual customer requirements, into an easy-to-use, uniform interface.

To address this challenge, Brainlab has developed the Buzz system, which has been fully optimized for user-centric integration in the clinical workflow. Independent of the individually connected systems and the functionality they provide, the user always interacts with the same user interface. Interaction occurs always in the context of the patient being treated using a large multi-touch screen with a home button, with e.g. DICOM image data and clinical applications readily accessible. Additionally, the number of multi-touch access points throughout the OR can be adjusted to meet individual customer requirements.

Table 1 gives a top-level overview about three typical Buzz configurations and their feature characteristics: Buzz on-wall, Buzz in-wall and Buzz with advanced Audio/Video (A/V) functionalities.

What exactly is Buzz?

Buzz is a medical product that has been specially designed and developed by Brainlab for information processing and control in the OR. The focus of the system is a 42-inch touch screen, which serves as a central control point in the OR
