What would you like to prove? How do you prove it? And what would you like to disprove? How do you disprove it? These may be the only questions you can ask, but you will find that the answers will tell you the story. If you can't think of any, then just start with a few simple questions and gradually disprove them one by one until you have a clear picture of what you are trying to prove. This is the best way to prove something. It's not always easy, but it's the only way to prove it.

This additional correspondence concerned itself with the various forms and the functions of the various religious communities and their relationship to the church, making a distinct place apart, especially in the Society. It concerned the forms of organization, the various forms of government, the various forms of discipline, the various forms of education, and the various forms of the liturgy. These gave the Society a distinctive character, distinguishing the Society from the other religious communities and the church at large. Other is the term "ecclesiastical organization," which is a title or a name for certain ecclesiastical communities, which are the various forms of the church.
