Identities in Video Role-playing Games Zachary Charles Waggoner, 2007 This study investigates the relationships between virtual identity and non virtual identity in video role playing games Utilizing James Gee's identity theoretical constructs of real world identity virtual world identity and projective identity the study analyzes the connections via a projective identity in liminal space between real world identities of video game users and their diegetic avatar the virtual world identity Phenomenological data oral interviews and video gameplay transcription and analysis was collected from two participants who each played ten hours of the computer role playing game Morrowind Participants with high levels of videogame literacy and interest in the role playing genre of videogames were selected for this study Findings indicate that the relationships between the virtual avatar and the real world user were dynamic and complex real world identities continually informed the virtual identity of the avatar This study provides one methodological approach for the collection transcription and analysis of video game data This study also recommends the creation of two new terms to aid in the formation of reliable and consistent terminology in the field of video game theory First the term real world identity used by Gee and other scholars to describe non virtual identities was found to be problematic This study found that virtual identities created and maintained by users non virtual identities may be just as real to users as their non virtual identities Therefore this study recommends replacing the term real world with non virtual for future studies on identity construction in virtual spaces The study also suggests creation of the term verisimulacratude to help describe how users identify with and become immersed in video games set in fantastical simulacra like gameworlds Creation of the new terminological binaries virtual non virtual and verisimulacratude verisimilitude allows scholars to more accurately study the rhetoric of video games and identity construction within virtual diegetic spaces

Avatar and Self Pamela L. Andrews, 2013 This project responds to a problem in scholarship describing the relationship between virtual avatars and their physical users In Life on the Screen Sherry Turkle identifies points of slippage wherein the persona of the avatar becomes conflated with the user s sense of self to create an authentic self predicated on both real and virtual experiences Turkle 184 5 Although the conflation of the authentic self with the virtual has provided various affordances for serious games or other pedagogical projects such as classrooms hosted through the game Second Life the processes enabling identification with an avatar have been largely overlooked This project examines several layers of influence that affect how users play with identity to create successful social performances within an online community connected to a work of fiction In doing so the user must consider his or her own motivations for creating a persona how these motivations will allow the avatar to achieve social acceptance and how these social performances connect to the scene created by the work of fiction Using an online role playing forum based on a work of fiction as a site of analysis this project will borrow from game studies dramatism and identity theory to create a framework for discussing processes through which users identify with their virtual avatars

Avatar Identification Methods in Skyrim and Dragon Age: Origins Andrew John Fitcher, 2022 Video games as a medium have always focused on having their players interact with their game worlds and narratives regardless of genre However a repeatedly debated concept is whether players are able to feel a sense of identification with their avatars The majority of this debate revolves around studying works with a multiplayer focus such as MMOs where players can interact with one another This paper seeks to explore if players can identify with their avatar in single player role playing games RPG as this genre focuses on the player s direct influence on the narrative through various mechanics that allow the player to craft an avatar s identity These mechanics typically include character customization dialogue choice and narrative consequences which permits the player to form a unique narrative with their avatar and thus characterize the avatar throughout their time playing a game This paper will use Bethesda s The Elder Scrolls V Skyrim and BioWare s Dragon Age Origins as case studies on how this genre accomplishes player identification and how different games use their own methods to accomplish this The ultimate goal is to explore how games as an interactive medium can allow players to become active participants in these games and shape their narratives My Avatar, My Self Zachery Tyler Rakes,2016      Narrative and Identity in Fantasy Role-playing Games Ken Lacy,2006
