Products in Developing Countries Nava Ashraf,2003 Many financial institutions in developing countries offer savings products Yet little has been done to assess systematically and quantitatively the relative merits of different product designs This paper first examines different designs that provide incentives to clients to commit to save Mechanisms are divided into deposit side mechanisms that help clients make regular deposits and withdrawal side mechanisms that help clients restrict the use of their funds except for well planned uses or emergencies Then using results from a short web based survey of microfinance institutions we describe different commitment savings products in use around the world Social Capital and Institutions of Poverty Reduction in Africa Osaore A Aideyan,2014-06-26 There have been many books written about the issue of poverty in Africa Most of them look at failed policies and criticize what does not work This text looks at what does work and outlines how to implement these effective policies The question of credibility and strategic behaviors in institutions of poverty reduction is an area that needs to be addressed adequately and the author attempts to deal with it in a pragmatic way In the academic literature on designating effective institutions of poverty alleviation programs and policies in sub Saharan Africa it is rare to find direct assessments of the success of particular social policies and programs In country after country one is much more likely to see research on the failure of poverty reduction programs Very often contributors to the literature gravitate towards the presentation of raw numbers and figures indicating that these policies and programs have failed and thus call for the discontinuation of such policies. Curiously the most straightforward questions that many people outside of the development circle seem to want answered are such as on what criteria are these conclusions reached or what particular policies and programs have made a dent in poverty are less popular in the discipline. This study focuses on the preconditions for success in poverty reduction programs. It proposes a framework which incorporates a mixture of social and political as well as economic relationships which these programs embody. Using evidence from original surveys of two micro finance programs in Southern Nigeria this policy evaluation study attempts from the standpoint of institutional and social capital theories to accomplish two goals: first to fill the gaps in the literature by developing an evaluation framework emphasizing institutional design features and a strong network of relationships which lower costs for beneficiaries and providers and second to provide critical input for the policy task of designing effective institutions of poverty reduction programs.
