

Natural Selection Practice

Below is a series of pictures representing changes in a population of cacti over many generations.

1. Figure 4 shows the situation several months later. What has happened?
 - a. Why would a deer be more likely to eat the left cactus than the right cactus?

In figure 3, the right cactus has flowers, but the cactus that has been eaten by the deer is too damaged to make flowers!

 - b. Do you think that evolution by natural selection is occurring in this cactus population? Explain why or why not.
 - c. What adaptation seems to increase the fitness of the cacti on the right? How do you think this adaptation increases the ability of cacti on the right to survive and reproduce?
5. You have seen, in all of these examples, how natural selection favors those individuals with certain traits. Based on what you have seen AND on what you know about genetics, answer the following questions:
 - a. Is the dominant characteristic ALWAYS the one that is most seen in a population? (think about our work with human genetics)
 - b. Assume that in the cactus population, the presence of thorns is a recessive characteristic. Will the frequency of the allele for thorns become greater or lesser over time?
