HYBRID & ELECTRIC CARS

The majority of cars that are on the road today run on gasoline. Gas is made from oil and other Fossil Fuels. It is a non-renewable resource. This means once it runs out, there will not be any left. For this reason, gas must be used carefully. Cars powered by gas are bad for the environment because they give off greenhouse gases. People can drive eco-friendly, or green, cars that are better for the environment. Green cars run on a combination of electricity and gas. Some only run on electricity.

HYBRID CARS

Hybrid cars have two kinds of power. An engine runs on gas, while a motor runs on electricity. The two power sources work together to make a car run more efficiently. A gas engine powers a hybrid car when it moves at average speeds. The car battery charges when the engine runs. The electric motor kicks in when a hybrid car speeds up to help the engine move the car forward. Most hybrid cars mostly run on gas, but the electric motor lets it use less of it. Less gas means fewer emissions, or gases given off. In the process of burning fuel for energy, hybrid cars save money over time because they get more miles per gallon.

ELECTRIC CARS

An electric car runs entirely on electricity. Surprisingly, a trend of all early cars were electric. After gas became more available, electric cars disappeared though. People are looking for ways to use less gas now, so electric cars are back. The electric motor in an electric car is stored in a battery pack. The battery powers a motor that turns the wheels. The car must be plugged in to charge the battery once the electricity runs out. Electric cars are quiet because they do not have engines. They also save money on fuel. Drivers only have to pay to charge the battery. Electric cars will only go as far as their charge will take them, so they must stay close to charging stations. Some drivers worry about running out of power because of this. For those people, hybrid options are the best. Of course, the "greenest" way to travel is by walking or riding a bike.
