Making Music in Muscle Shoals Christopher Michael Reali, 2014 Muscle Shoals Alabama is a unique site for studying the complex intertwining of music race and the American South Exploring this region reveals how and why the music recorded in Muscle Shoals became integral to the cultural framework within 1960s and 70s America Making Music in Muscle Shoals utilizes an integrative framework that draws upon musicology ethnomusicology music theory and complementary disciplines such as American and African American studies as it examines this northwest Alabama music industry By combining the musical analysis of key soul recordings original interviews and previously overlooked archival materials this work constructs a multifaceted interpretation of the Muscle Shoals sound as a sonic product of time place and specific people imbued with cultural meaning The period considered 1960 to 1975 includes the ascension dominance and decline of soul music on the pop music charts as well as Muscle Shoals transition from soul mecca to pop music hit factory This dissertation relies upon two methodologies 1 musical analysis 2 ethnographic research and two case studies In the first I foreground the contributions of the all white studio musicians to identify the musical elements that characterize the so called Muscle Shoals sound My conclusions challenge the often narrowly focused associations between race and soul music and revise the place of Muscle Shoals within the narrative of an authentic black Southern musical past This dissertation therefore provides a model for the study of people music and place Ultimately Making Music in Muscle Shoals fills lacunae within the larger narrative of
