This additional correspondence concerned itself with the various forms and the functions of the various religious communities and their relationship to the church, making a distinct place apart, especially in the Society. It concerned the forms of organization, the various forms of government, the various forms of discipline, the various forms of education, and the various forms of the liturgy. These gave the Society a distinctive character, distinguishing the Society from the other religious communities and the church at large. Other is the term "ecclesiastical organization," which is a title or a name for certain ecclesiastical communities. These give the Society a distinctive character, distinguishing the Society from the other religious communities and the church at large.
