Profiling Transit Ridership Canadian Urban Transit Association, Tranplan Associates, Strategic Transit Research Program, 2000. This report considers alternative ways of describing the customers, potential customers of a transit system in order to improve transit planning, marketing, and policy making. It presents findings of a literature review which examined traditional transit industry attitude surveys and related studies as well as reports data produced as part of transportation modelling studies conducted since the late 1950s. Based on the literature review, transit rider typologies are developed. The concluding section discusses the service planning, marketing implications of the information reviewed and makes recommendations related to data collection, analysis, and related research issues. The appendix includes a detailed review of various studies that provide alternative approaches to transit customer profiling.
