Evolutionary Relationships of the Porifera, Cnidaria, and Ctenophora. This figure shows one interpretation of the relationships of the Ctenophora, Porifera, and Cnidaria to other members of the animal kingdom. Evidence for these relationships is based on modern developmental and molecular biology. (a) Members of the phylum Ctenophora are the comb jellies. New information suggests that ancestral members of the phylum Ctenophora may be closest to the root of this animal phylogeny. Aequorea victoria is shown here. It is native to the western Atlantic Ocean. (b) Members of the phylum Porifera are probably derived from ancestral choanoflagellate stocks. (The red finger sponge, Haliclona rubens, and a bowl sponge, Xestospongia, are shown here. They are both found in Caribbean waters.) (c) Members of the phylum Cnidaria arose very early in animal evolution—probably from radially symmetrical ancestors. Physalia physalis, the Portuguese man-of-war, is shown here. The tentacles can be up to 9 m long and are laden with nematocysts that are lethal to small vertebrates and dangerous to humans. A bluish float at the surface of the water is about 12 cm long. It is not shown in this photograph. Physalia physalis occurs throughout the Caribbean and southern Atlantic Coast.

Origins of Multicellularity

The oldest animal fossils known date to about 600 million years ago (see Evolutionary Insights, page 127). Molecular studies provide dates for poriferans (sponges) going back 650 million years. Clearly, multicellularity has a history that extends deep into the Precambrian times. Tracing the events that led to multicellularity is difficult, but modern molecular techniques are providing new information on what may have occurred so very long ago.

Multicellularity arose multiple times in the Eukarya, but probably one time in the animal lineage. The fact that it arose at least 10 times in the Eukarya implies that there must be selective advantage in multicellular existence. The selective advantages probably include defense. Larger size was less vulnerable to predation by predatory protists. In addition, exchanges with the environment were more efficient in organisms made of more, smaller cells. Further, increasing diffusion distances limit the size of single cells (see figure 2.3 and accompanying discussion). Finally, multicellularity permits subdivision of labor in an organism. Cells can be specialized for specific functions like reproduction, feeding and digestion, sensory perception, and communication.
