DeWind, 2015-11-06 The end of the Cold War did not bring about the grand peace that was hoped for during four decades Instead the world has become more dangerous with multiple complex problems Military institutions worldwide must learn to adapt to the ever changing face of the threat to fight the Global War on Terror Services can no longer look within their own ranks to accomplish the mission all operations must be joint in order to succeed in the contemporary operating environment This monograph traces the thread between civil military relations during two times of war for the U S The military must know what the civilian leadership requires and must in return articulate a clear path to achieve it if feasible The U S military never lost a battle in Vietnam and yet that conflict is looked upon as an American defeat The war in Iraq began to look like a repeat performance The military was clearly winning engagements on the battlefield but the talk at home in the media was of a quagmire and stagnation two terms used to describe Vietnam and ultimately of defeat Although this monograph uses two snapshots in time of civil military relations the significance of its findings apply in general to all students interested in civil military relations as well as decision making Whether looking at times of war or peace civil military relations play a significant role in all matters pertaining to the running of our military the decisions made by our civilian leadership can influence even the smallest facets of military life
