Individuals of fundamental concern in community mental health therapy, including service users and family members, it is a personal response that influences those characteristics of community, from individuals to nations, to the living and not static, into the concepts of security, resilience, ethics, and responsibility for mental health.

Defining boundaries between science and the market, including the regulation of the market, remains a major issue for both research and policy. Despite the increasing globalisation of research, market and policy, increasing cross-boundary discussions, technical and institutional, are helping to define the boundaries of science. However, in protecting science from being controlled by the market, a clear distinction must be made between the market and politics. Research regulations, institutions, and research ethics, and their relationship to the market, are key issues for science and policy.
