These findings are partly corroborated by other studies showing similar gains for the same training methods for the same cognitive outcomes. Thus, employing these methods gives the advantages over other methods of better validity in assessing these performance gains (e.g., Thompson, 1992; Tippins, 1999). These results also suggest that the visual and verbal subtests of the computerized tests exceed the reliability characteristics of the paper-and-pencil tests, and therefore, it appears the computerized tests also provide more accurate assessments of cognitive abilities of children and adults than paper-and-pencil tests.
