

"ALGAE" - A DIVERSE ASSORTMENT OF LIFE FORMS

Photosynthesis is performed by a taxonomically diverse assortment of marine organisms. The term "algae" excludes the near-shore vascular plants (with leaves, roots, and flowers) but includes forms as varied as microscopic cyanobacteria, crustose forms that are reef-builders, and macroscopic "seaweeds".

CYANOBACTERIA

RED ALGAE

BLUE-GREEN, BROWN, RED, AND GREEN

The common names for marine algae sort them into color groups: blue-green (Cyanobacteria), brown (Phaeophyta), red (Rhodophyta), and green (Chlorophyta). These names do not necessarily match their actual appearance, but do reflect differences in their structure and function, and their taxonomic classification.

SOURCES OF ALGAE IN B2 OCEAN BIOME

The community of algae was built 1990 with natural seawater (from Southern California, 10% of total volume), "live rock" including attached organisms (from the Caribbean), and various bivalves and crustaceans (presumably Caribbean). In 1993, more live material was added (the details were not well documented), and in 1995 Pacific corals from Hawaii and Fiji were also added.

B2 OCEAN ALGAE SPECIES

The most recent survey of algae species in the B2 ocean was made in the fall of 2010 by undergraduates from the UA. They sampled along 14 transect lines to obtain a representation of the species present. However, they were not able to sample in the deepest water. Comparing to a list of 13 species from 2003, they found fewer species (9), but 7 species that were not listed in 2003. It may be that cyanobacteria were not included in the 2003 survey.

The students noted that Spirogyra, a cyanobacteria, was common almost throughout the biome, to the extent that it may have been blocking light required for other species. The green algae Dictyosphaeria cavernosa, D. aculeata, and Volvox ventricosus were common near the shore, possibly because the light wave action of the water there made conditions less appropriate for the cyanobacteria.
