

Medication Management Roles in Assisted Living

ABSTRACT

Residents in assisted living (AL) frequently need assistance with medication management. Rooted in a social model, AL serves people facing increasing health management challenges as they “age in place.” This study explored roles in AL medication management and satisfaction with unlicensed assistive personnel (UAP) as medication aides, a cost-effective staffing approach that is used frequently. The sample included 112 participants representing all parties involved in medication administration (residents, medication aides, administrators, RNs and licensed practical nurses, pharmacists, and primary care providers) in 15 AL settings in four states. Results include description of medication management roles; empirical validation of existing AL nursing professional standards; and satisfaction with the role of UAP as medication aide from all perspectives. Clinical implications include creating a supportive environment for medication aides (i.e., UAPs); the importance of the RN role as facilitator of AL medication management; and the need for collaboration and interprofessional team development across disparate settings. Journal of Gerontological Nursing, xx(x), xx-xx.]

Assistance with medication management is a common need for residents in assisted living (AL) who frequently have multiple health conditions and take multiple routine medications (Assisted Living Federation of America, 2006; Center for Excellence in Assisted Living, 2008). Although AL as a residential setting is growing dramatically, there are no federal standards or definitions, and state licensing definitions and standards vary greatly [Query #1: What “standards” are you talking about? In regard to medication management?] (Mollica, Houser & Ujvari, 2012). Depending on state regulations, day-to-day assistance with medications may be provided by unlicensed assistive personnel (UAP), often known as medication aides, under the general supervision and/or delegation of an RN. Stone (2010) called for research to obtain a better understanding of direct care workers’ (i.e., UAP) involvement in AL medication management. Medication management, one of the top quality issues in AL (U.S. General Accounting Office, 1999), involves communication among residents/families, primary care providers (PCPs), pharmacists, and AL staff (e.g., administrative, nursing, UAP).

This article reports a component of a four-state study of medication management in AL. Previously published findings focused on medication errors by UAP (Young et al., 2008) and strategies to promote safe medication administration (Young, Sikma, Reinhard, McCormick, & Cartwright, 2013). The purpose of this article is to: (a) describe the perceptions of residents, UAP, RNs, PCPs, and pharmacists regarding their roles in the medication management process in AL facilities; and (b) describe the satisfaction of these individuals with their medication management roles.
