Introduction

Fish and fishery products constitute an important food component for a large section of world population, more so in developing countries, where fish forms a cheap source of protein. In the last two decades there has been an increase in awareness about the nutritional and health benefits of fish consumption. The low fat content of some fish and the presence of poly unsaturated fatty acids in red meat fishes which are known to reduce the risks of coronary heart diseases, have increased the dietary and health significance of seafood consumption (Din et al., 2004). In USA, seafood consumption has increased from an average of 4.5 kg per person in 1960 to about 7.0 kg per person in 2002 (NOAA, 2003). Total fishery production in 2001 was reported to be 130.2 million tonnes, of which 37.9 (30%) million tonnes was from aquaculture, 90% of which came from Asian countries. On the other hand, seafood is also known to have been responsible for a significant percentage of food borne diseases. With increased fish consumption, there is also an increase in the number of food-borne illness associated with fishery products. In the United States, 10-19% of food-borne illness involved seafood as a vehicle and between 1993 and 1997, 6.8% of the food-borne illnesses involved consumption of fish and shellfish (FAQ, 2004). In Japan, where seafood consumption is high and raw fish consumption is popular, 70% of food-borne illness is attributed to seafood. These data highlight the importance of seafood as vehicles for human illness.

However, the true incidence of seafood-borne diseases worldwide is not known, as there is no surveillance system in the developing countries. In addition to being responsible for human health problems, the presence of infectious agents in seafood results in rejection of seafood consignments leading to major economic losses to exporting countries in general, and to seafood processing industries in particular. Maintenance of seafood quality is central to ensuring the safety of seafood. This has been a major area of concern for seafood processing industries and a great challenge to scientists and researchers worldwide. This review focuses on agents and causes of human illness encountered in seafood and issues related to seafood safety and quality management.

Causes of seafood-borne illness

Seafood often harbour infectious agents that are present naturally in the aquatic environment or introduced through human activities. The illness may be due to the infection caused by the micro-organism or due to the intoxication by products of microorganisms. Viruses, bacteria and parasites are the agents of human disease associated with seafoods. The products of microorganism such as bacterial toxins, algal toxins or products of bacterial metabolism such as histamine can cause intoxication when fish or shellfish harbouring these products are consumed. In the case of live finfish, microorganisms may be associated with gill, gut and skin. Filter feeding shellfish like mollusks concentrate different types of microorganisms present in the environment around them. Some of the microorganisms of human health concern may be native to the aquatic environment such as the members of the genus Vibrio but others like Salmonella, E. coli and many viruses are introduced into the aquatic environment through human activities such as contamination by domestic sewage. The type of microorganism associated with seafood may vary depending upon whether it is fresh or processed. Most of the outbreaks of illnesses occur in countries where seafood is eaten raw or is inadequately cooked. For example, in Japan where seafood is eaten raw, 70% of food borne human illness is seafood associated (Scoging 2003).

Viruses associated with seafoods

Viruses constitute an important cause of seafood borne diseases. The intensity of human illness is known only from developed countries. For example in the USA, it is estimated that 80% of food borne illness are due to enteric viruses (Sair et al., 2002). The major limitation in diagnosing viral infections is the non-availability of techniques or facilities for detecting or identifying viral pathogens. The recent advances in Second International Congress on Seafood Technology on Sustainable, Innovative and Healthy Seafood John Ryder, Lahsen Ababouch, Murat O. Balaban, 2012 These proceedings contain the manuscripts from the Second International Congress on Seafood Technology on Sustainable Innovative and Healthy Seafood held in Anchorage the United States of America from 10 to 13 May 2010 The meeting included a range of views regarding the opportunities and the recent developments in sustainable innovative and healthy seafood. These included thoughts from government officials, business representatives and academia and highlighted that the seafood industry is in a position to take advantage of the many positive aspects that consumption of seafood offers to consumers while recognizing that there are still challenges ahead to realize fully the potential that seafood can achieve in international and national trade and in meeting consumer expectations.
