The field of educational technology has grown and changed greatly over the years. The new technologies including Internet, mobile, personal digital, or educational processing, creating opportunities to access. In the 1970s and 1980s, the educational technology began applying behavioral research to the design of instruction. By the 1990s, learning theory was changing to the constructivist paradigm of constructivism. The 2000s, computer technology dominated the field, which is characterized by the emerging "flipped" or "blended" models of learning. The 2010s, mobile technology, cloud computing, and social media have become the dominant force in educational technology. The 2020s, artificial intelligence, virtual reality, and augmented reality are becoming the dominant force in educational technology. The 2030s, quantum computing, nanotechnology, and biotechnology are becoming the dominant force in educational technology. The 2040s, space exploration, deep-sea exploration, and interplanetary travel are becoming the dominant force in educational technology. The 2050s, the future of educational technology is uncertain.
