The Price That Binds Shangwen Yi,David J. Hardisty,Dale W. Griffin,Thomas Allard,2023 This research examines the effectiveness of two common types of restricted price promotions threshold promotions conditional on spending more than a threshold amount or a promotion trigger and capped promotions limited to a maximum dollar value or a cap trigger Results show that threshold promotions are more effective than comparable capped promotions even though capped promotions dominate in economic savings when the promotional trigger value the critical spending level is low because consumers use the trigger value as an expectation based reference point leading to perceptions of greater fairness However when the trigger value is high this effect reverses and capped promotions are seen as fairer and consequently are more effective than threshold promotions We observe these results in a series of six pre registered studies including a field study on TikTok in both price and charity promotion contexts and for separate and joint evaluation modes We discuss the implications of our results for the effective management of price promotions Tik-Tok Mastery for Business Ronnie Griffins,2020-06-06 Would you like to attract more followers to your tik tok platform Would you like to advertise your products or services to a great

Unveiling the Impact of Sponsored Brand-related UGC on TikTok Anna Baumgartner, 2023 Given the increasing influence of brand related user generated content UGC on social mediaplatforms marketers are progressively integrating UGC into their marketing strategies. This significance has been further amplified by the rising prominence of UGC centric platforms like TikTok making it essential for marketers to establish their presence on such channels. Further more traditional methods of product promotion on social media are particularly inefficient for the younger generation as those are able to identify advertising efforts and remain unaffected by them. Given that the younger generation dominates TikTok brand related UGC on this platform becomes an even more relevant research subject. The study investigates the impact of brand related UGC sponsorship on consumer responses on TikTok in Austria by comparing organic with sponsored UGC Spark Ads vs Non Spark Ads. The results of an online experiment reveal that the type of sponsorship does not directly affect participants perceived risk brand attitude or purchase intention. However persuasion knowledge acts as a mediator for all three variables indicating its influencing role in the relationship between sponsorship and consumer responses. Moreover, the study demonstrates that sponsored UGC (whether Spark Ad or Non Spark Ad) is perceived as more persuasive, leading to greater activation of consumers' persuasion knowledge compared to organic brand-related UGC. Overall, the study emphasizes the importance of understanding the impact of sponsorship on consumer responses to brand-related UGC on TikTok. The findings suggest that the type of sponsorship has no direct effects on perceived risk, brand attitude, and purchase intention but rather indirect effects on consumer responses. The level of activated persuasion knowledge plays a crucial role in shaping these responses. The results provide valuable insights for brands seeking to utilize brand-related UGC on TikTok effectively. Brands should consider the level of persuasion knowledge that may be activated by sponsored UGC and its potential impact on consumer responses.
