Abstract:

Richard Flanagan's novel, The Unknown Terrorist, does not only depict terrorism and violence but especially contemporary postmodern life in an Australian urban setting influenced by media, information technologies and consumerism. Drawing on Jean Baudrillard's theory of simulacra and simulation, this paper analyses Flanagan's depiction especially of the main character, the Doll, and the way she symbolically represents various aspects of the process of simulation as understood by Baudrillard. In this context, the Doll and other characters are understood as subjects both manipulating and manipulated by the simulated image of reality represented by media and technology, the image which replaces physical reality. The imagery of manipulation is understood as a metaphor implying a critique of hypocrisy and consumerism of the contemporary urban setting in the technologically advanced society represented by the Australian city of Sydney.

Richard Flanagan's novel The Unknown Terrorist paints a terrifying picture of a contemporary Australian society influenced by the media, consumerism, hypocrisy, racism and the misuse of power. In this novel, Australian society is depicted as one in which an individual's identity is constantly manipulated and destructed by the media and a bureaucratic system of power and control. Flanagan shows how freedom, mostly associated with money and the economically advanced international and multicultural city of Sydney, can become a nightmare and prison created by the very means that create this freedom – that is money and the media. Because of the broad masses' access to media, technology and consumerism, these phenomena
