Other Patterns of Inheritance

Objectives:

- Describe the other patterns of inheritance beyond dominant and recessive alleles.
- Explain how a pedigree provides key information about inheritance.

Types of Inheritance:

- Segregation and Dominant alleles: These alleles are neither dominant nor recessive. By some of incomplete dominance, neither allele is completely dominant over the other. The phenotype is a blend of the two homozygous phenotypes. It is also known as incomplete dominance. The allele for white coat color is dominant over the allele for red, resulting in a blending model of genes.

Types of Inheritance:

- Co-dominance: Both genes in the heterozygous genotype are expressed in the phenotype. In the diagram to the right, a black and white white tail represents a co-dominant trait. Both white and black alleles are expressed. There is no blending or masking.

Multiple Alleles: These are multiple alleles that have more than two forms of the same gene. There may be more than one dominant form, and several different phenotypes. Incomplete dominance is an example of multiple alleles where one gene is

Types of Inheritance:

- Incomplete Dominance: This is a blending model of genes. The diagram to the right shows a black and white cow. The black allele is dominant over the white allele. The white allele is recessive. The black allele is partially dominant, so the cow is black and white.

Pedigree:

Types of Inheritance:

- Recessive alleles: These are recessive alleles that are not expressed in the phenotype. In the diagram to the right, a black and white cow is homozygous for the white allele. The white allele is dominant over the black allele. The black allele is recessive. The cow is black and white because the black allele is not expressed.
