then portioning it up to reuse and store meals for later. If you've ever had leftover from dinner to take with you for lunch the next day, you've learned that meal prepping refers to preparing 3-7 days worth of food at a time. This kind of time-consuming work can be done once instead of every day. You can use this same technique for breakfast, lunch, dinner, and snacks. Meal prepping involves preparing food in advance to reduce waste and save time. It's a great way to plan ahead or budget. When you're on a budget, the question is, "How can I eat healthy meals without having to spend a lot of money each day?" For most people, it's not about convenience and spending more than you have. With meal prepping, you get to eat the same thing for a few days in a row, so if you don't like leftovers or get bored with the same meal every day, it's not for you. If you're maximizing your time and budget, it's important to consider what you're eating. For example, if you're eating the same meal every day, it's likely that you'll get tired of it. Or maybe one other person eats a whole meal for you. Meal planning for a week can be quite difficult because you'll need to consider the individual nuances of your diet, including allergies, dietary restrictions, and preferences. Always begin with the recommended guidelines by the FDA and then adjust them to your own preferences. In general, I don't like eating the same meal for more than a few days, so I find that it's best to have a variety of meals.
