Nancy A. Heitzeg

School-to-prison pipeline defined

For nearly three decades, scholars, educators, and activists in the United States have decried the emergence of a school-to-prison pipeline. The school-to-prison pipeline is most immediately a consequence of the criminalization of school discipline via zero-tolerance policies. It is further characterized by schools that rely on suspensions, expulsions, and arrests for minor infractions, and schools that have police and/or security officers (School Resource Officers or SROs) present for enforcement. The school-to-prison pipeline funnels students out of educational institutions and, indirectly and directly, towards legal encounters with police and the juvenile justice system (Fuentes, 2013; Heitzeg, 2016). This push towards prison and jail may be indirect; students who are suspended and/or expelled are less likely to return to school, are sent to underresourced alternative schools, and are, in effect, ‘pushed out’ of the educational system. Increasingly, the school-to-prison pipeline operates in a more direct fashion, as misconduct is criminalized and as a growing police presence in the schools allows for direct arrests and ticketing, often for minor misconduct that once would have been handled by teachers and school administrators (Advancement Project, 2011).

While these policies were promoted by the perceived need to increase safety and security, zero-tolerance policies and police in schools have instead increased the risks of criminalization for segments of the student body, most dramatically for students of colour. This pattern of ‘push-out’ has become so pronounced that scholars, child advocates, and community activists now refer to it as the school-to-prison pipeline, the schoolhouse-to-jailhouse track, or – as younger and younger students are targeted – the cradle-to-prison track (Advancement Project, 2004; Children’s Defense Fund, 2007; NAACP, 2005). More recently, the parallels between education and incarceration have been referred to as the school-to-prison nexus. Rather than seeing the school as a location which steers certain students towards incarceration, this framing acknowledges the myriad practices that schools and prisons have in common and the confluence of structural forces that shape criminalization.
