

The Health Hazard Evaluation Program at NIOSH

This report evaluates the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH) Health Hazard Evaluation Program for its relevance and impact in identifying and responding to occupational health hazards. The report finds that the program has had a positive impact on workforce conditions, responds well during public health emergencies, and offers excellent training programs for occupational health professionals. The program could be further strengthened by increasing its visibility, by expanding communication and outreach activities, and by expanding its training programs.

Exposure to chemical or physical hazards in the workplace can lead to illness, injury, or even death. These hazards can also be costly to employers due to loss of productivity caused by lost days of work by employees, increased workers' compensation payments, and legal costs. It is the unique mission of the Health Hazard Evaluation Program within the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH) to respond to requests to investigate previously unknown potential occupational health hazards and known health hazards found in new occupational settings. In contrast to other NIOSH programs, the Health Hazard Evaluation Program is not primarily a research program. Rather, it investigates and provides advice to workplaces in response to requests from employers, labor unions, and federal agencies. The program also responds to emergencies such as the 9/11 attacks and provides training in field investigations to many health and safety professionals.

The Health Hazard Evaluation Program has been instrumental in identifying a wide array of hazards such as potentially fatal latex allergies associated with latex glove use in medical facilities, and the occupational transmission of infectious diseases to workers in swine processing facilities. In a highly publicized case in 1999, the program responded to a call to investigate a microwave popcorn manufacturing plant where workers were becoming ill with a rare lung disease. The investigation showed a link between occupational exposure to a butter flavoring and the illness, which became widely known as "popcorn lung" (see Box 1, p. 2).

As part of a series of reviews of NIOSH programs, the National Research Council assembled a committee to evaluate the NIOSH Health Hazard Evaluation Program with respect to its 1) relevance in addressing workplace health hazards, 2) impacts on worker health and safety as well as its impacts through outreach, and 3) future directions to improve both relevance and impact of the program.

ASSESSMENT OF THE PROGRAM'S RELEVANCE AND IMPACT
