In Paradise Paul Heyse, James Zimmerhoff, 2017-08-05

The air cleared by a thunderstorm the night before was still tremulous with that soft invigorating warmth which farther south makes breathing such an easy matter but which north of the Alps seldom outlasts the early morning And yet the bells that sounded from the Munich Frauenkirche far across the Theresienwiese and the field where stands the great statue of Bavaria were already ringing for high mass Here outside the city there seemed to be no human ear to listen The great bronze maiden stood there in the deepest solitude holding her wreath above her head and with a mazed and dreamy look as though she might be thinking whether this were not an opportune moment to step down from her granite pedestal and to wander at will through the town that to day raised its towers and roofs like a city of the dead above the bare green plain Now and then a bird flew out of the little grove behind the Ruhmes halle and fluttered about the shoulders of the giant maiden or rested for a moment on the mane of the lion that sat lazily listening pressed close to the knee of his great mistress But away in the city the bells rang on The air grew drowsy with the steadily increasing heat with the hum and the vibration of the distant ringing and the strong fragrance that rose from the meadow which had been mown the day before At last the bells ceased and now not a sound was to be heard save that there came from a house in one of the outer streets the sound of a flute played by fits and starts as though the player stopped for breath between the passages or as though he forgot his notes in other thoughts The window from which this singular music sounded into the summer air opened from the upper story of a house that stood some distance back from the street a house of a kind of which there are many in this western suburb They are generally entirely unornamented boxlike buildings windowless except on the northern side and there pierced by great quadrangular openings supplied with all manner of arrangements for admitting the steadiest possible light from above In summer one never sees above them the little cloud of smoke that betrays a domestic hearth and no profane smell of cooking meets the visitor upon the threshold as in most other Munich houses From the open windows floats only a light invisible odor of tobacco smoke agreeably mingled with the invigorating fragrance of varnishes oils and turpentine which shows that here only the holy fire of art is fed and that here upon silent altars three legged easels and sculptors pedestals are offered sacrifices that cannot even shelter the priests that offer them from the pangs of hunger The house of which we speak turned its windowless southern side toward a little yard in which lay scattered marble and sandstone blocks of different sizes The four studio windows of the northern side looked into a carefully tended narrow garden that sheltered them from all disagreeable reflected lights Around a little slender drowsily splashing fountain in the middle bloomed a glorious wealth of roses and the neighboring flower beds filled with all kinds of garden stuff were enclosed in thick borders of mignonette Here the smell of oil and turpentine just referred to could not penetrate especially as only the two upper studios were those of painters while in the lower story as could be seen by the blocks of stone in the yard a sculptor carried on his art
