then portioning it up to reuse and meals for later. If you've ever kept up with your leftovers from dinner to take with you for lunch the next day, you've learned that meal prepping refers to preparing 3-7 days worth of food at a time. This kind of time management is great for lunches for the week, but instead of keeping up with lunch, you can use this same technique for breakfast, lunch, dinner, and snacks. Meal prepping involves preparing food in advance to reduce waste and reduce time spent on cooking. Whether you plan a day or a budget, when you're not rushed, you have more time to focus on convenience and preparing more than you eat. With meal prepping, you get to eat the same thing for a few days in a row, so if you don't like leftovers or get bored with the same meal prepping night after night, having a variety of meals is important. The budget is more reasonable when you eat the same thing every night, and it's easier to stick to a budget when you're not spending money on groceries. If you're maximizing your time and budget, it's important to consider the individual nuances of your meal plan. For example, if you're eating refrigerated meals, the texture and flavor may be different from when you eat them at room temperature. Or, if you're eating a meal for one, it may be more difficult to store it for later. In general, meal prepping is a great way to save time and money, but it's important to consider the individual nuances of your meal plan.
