

Arrivals to New Zealand

After the invention of compasses, the sea was the only way people could cross oceans. It is one of the most ancient tools on our planet. We know that this country was and still is very isolated from other countries because large bodies of water surround it.

As early as 1000 AD, people such as Maori relied on their specialised sailing methods and vast knowledge of navigation to sail from the more northern Polynesian islands. We can see the first record proven to capture a written note back to a known place that Maori arrived at, but here is an example of what it is thought to have looked like:

The 1700s marked the beginning of the mass migration of many Maori tribes to Aotearoa. They spent several weeks and months making their journeys across the Pacific Ocean. Many of the sea journeys became quite treacherous trips along their travels. The Maori were trapped off of Samoa and Marquesas before continuing the journey to Aotearoa. The Maori tribes would travel to their land at Rangitoto before Aotearoa. The Maori stayed at these islands because the sea path they were following had them pass them. They also needed to collect supplies for the journey and sometimes spent their weeks. These boats were different as they had a space for sleeping and room to store food and supplies in their design. They also had a special type of sail, known as a 'mātau'.

Arrivals to New Zealand

Many of these Maori that had come of sea to the shores may have known that New Zealand was on to the place in hope of:

and reached the British Crown place names. Each was sent as letters to document and map out the trip to Aotearoa.

and a map from 1840 named after it had been. How does the name translate into the:
