significantly longer at social stimuli For the provisionally autistic group as a whole orienting in all 3 paradigms was significantly correlated with posterior cerebellar vermis area but not with age IQ frontal lobe volume corpus callosum area or total brain volume supporting previous research findings of a specific role of the cerebellum in the rapid deployment of attentional resources Duration of attentional response to social vs nonsocial stimuli in the naturalistic paradigm was associated with frontal lobe and total brain volumes Studies such as these which directly quantify brain behavior relationships in autistic children are a fruitful and important area for investigation
