Background image showing various geological samples (igneous, metamorphic, sedimentary rocks) and a world map.

Pattern of Crustal Activity Lab

Mountains form when tectonic plates collide. The mountains they form are called mountains. These plates are built upon a semi-fluid layer beneath them called the asthenosphere. These plates are always moving, and where they interact with each other, we see interesting geological activity like earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and mountain formation. In this lab, you'll explore how these events are not random but follow specific patterns. By looking at where mountains are located, you'll be able to predict where they will form and understand how these patterns work. This will help you understand the exciting and interesting geology of our planet!

Objectives: In this lab, students explore how different types of crustal activity are related to specific locations. From it, students will predict where these events will occur, analyze their locations, and identify other geological events that seem to be linked to these mountain ranges.

Materials:

- Computer
- Internet

Analysis Questions:

- Using your model map, describe the location of mountains, volcanoes, and earthquakes. Are these locations randomly distributed, or do they follow a specific pattern?
- With a map of North and South America, plot the greatest amount of mountains, volcanoes, and earthquakes.
- With a map of the greatest amount of mountains, volcanoes, and earthquakes.
- With a map of the greatest amount of mountains, volcanoes, and earthquakes.
- With a map of the greatest amount of mountains, volcanoes, and earthquakes.

What is your conclusion about the probability of where an earthquake or volcano will happen in a region?
