1. When there are no differences between the groups for baseline performance, random assignment of subjects to the two groups is sufficient to ensure that both groups are comparable. Both random assignment and randomization are used.
2. When there are no differences between the groups for baseline performance, random assignment of subjects to the two groups is sufficient to ensure that both groups are comparable. Both random assignment and randomization are used, and this comparison should be done at the time of randomization.
3. The investigator compares the two groups at the time immediately before or after randomization. The investigator then randomizes subjects to the two groups, only those random subjects are included in the analysis.
4. The investigator randomizes subjects to the two groups before randomization and randomizes subjects to the two groups.
5. The investigator randomizes subjects to the two groups before randomization and randomizes subjects to the two groups.
