Abstract

The increasing remittance flows to the labor sending developing countries in recent years have generated huge optimism in the contemporary development discourse about the possibility of development at the grassroots levels which has been an overwhelming challenge for the development actors for decades. However, the realization of such potential proves difficult due to a lack of common understanding of the phenomenon of labor migration and its causes and consequences. This study focuses on the existing literature on international labor migration, its causes and consequences with a view to identify a common line of theorizing about the issue in question.

Keywords: International migration, Migration theories, Migration and development, Transnationalism

1. Introduction

"Today, the impact of remittances is recognized in all developing regions of the world, constituting an important flow of foreign currency to most countries and directly reaching millions of households, totaling approximately 10 per cent of the world's population..... The driving force behind this phenomenon is an estimated 150 million migrants worldwide who sent more than US$300 billion to their families in developing countries during 2006, typically US$100, US$200 or US$300 at a time, through more than 1.5 billion separate financial transactions" (IFAD, 2007). These funds have generated startling optimism for development, particularly for effective grassroots economic development in the rural areas in the developing countries that present some of the greatest challenges to financial inclusion. However, we need to address all the complex dynamics of motives and usages of remittances to realizing the development potentials of remittances both in the host and home countries (Brown, 2006) which requires a review of our understanding of the reasons for, and impact of, migration in the developing countries. In the discourse of International Migration (or more precisely, International Labor Migration), various works are found where the researchers attempted to theorize about people's movement and ensuing consequences over last few decades. The main focuses in these studies are measuring the extent of international labor migration, defining its dominant characteristics, and particularly evaluating its contribution to socio-economic development (Goss & Lindquist, 1995). Nevertheless, those researchers are thought of being distracted by the adoption of incompatible theoretical approaches and selecting diverse context and wide range of variables for empirical studies, and consequently, those studies resulted in further ambiguity. The situation in evaluating the consequences of international labor migration has become further complicated by the researchers' preferential emphasis on national economies, communities, or households as unit of analysis (Kearney, 1986). This paper is an attempt to understand the causes behind individuals' movement across national borders and their remittance practices,
