Science Experiments Reading Comprehension

Science experiments are activities or tasks involving the use of scientific methods, instruments, materials, and other resources to investigate, measure, and observe the natural world.

The process of conducting a science experiment usually begins with a question or problem. The goal of the experiment is to determine whether the question or problem can be answered through observation, testing, and other methods of investigation.

Key elements of a typical experiment include variables and controls, and manipulating, measuring, and observing variables to see how they affect each other. Variables are the factors that are changed during the experiment, while controls are the factors that remain constant.

Science experiments are often repeated to confirm results, and different scientists may use different methods to conduct the same experiment. The results of an experiment can be communicated in various ways, such as through written reports, oral presentations, or displays.

Science experiments can be conducted in various settings, such as laboratories, classrooms, or outdoor environments. They can involve anything from simple observations to complex experiments.
