

THE LIVER OF THE RAT

The liver of the rat is a large, reddish-brown organ, situated in the upper right quadrant of the abdominal cavity. It is divided into two main lobes, the right and left lobes, by the falciform ligament. The right lobe is larger and more rounded, while the left lobe is smaller and more elongated. The liver is covered by a thin, translucent capsule, which is composed of a single layer of cuboidal cells. The capsule is continuous with the peritoneum, which lines the abdominal cavity. The liver is connected to the stomach by the hepatic portal vein, which carries blood from the stomach to the liver. The liver is also connected to the gallbladder by the cystic duct, which carries bile from the liver to the gallbladder. The liver is supplied with oxygenated blood by the hepatic artery, which branches into the right and left hepatic arteries. The liver is also supplied with nutrients by the hepatic portal vein, which carries blood from the stomach to the liver. The liver is a highly vascularized organ, with a rich network of blood vessels and bile ducts. It plays a central role in the metabolism of nutrients and the production of bile.
