Cellular Health How To Florida:

Cellular Response of Loblolly Pine to Wound Inoculation with Bark Beetle-associated Fungi and Chitosan Kier Dean Klepzig, 2003 We inoculated loblolly pines with bark beetle associated fungi and a fungal cell wall component chitosan known to induce responses in some pines and many other plants Trees in Florida were inoculated with Leptographium procerum L terebrantis Ophiostoma minus or chitosan Trees in Louisiana were inoculated with O minus Entomocorticium sp A or Ceratocystiopsis ranaculosus In both Florida and Louisiana mechanical wounds served as controls Treatment responses were sampled after 3 weeks and all produced uniform responses across trees Inoculations with E sp A and C ranaculosus appeared similar to controls Inoculations with L procerum produced slightly higher levels of host damage Loblolly pine responded similarly to chitosan and pathogenic bark beetle associated fungi O minus and L terebrantis producing high levels of phenolic compounds and cell hydrolysis in the callus In addition callus inoculated with O minus appeared extremely disrupted and stringy Chitosan inoculations resulted in no hydrolysis but produced extremely high levels of phenolics deposition as well as noticeable periderm formation Our results reveal possible morphological mechanisms for pine secondary response to these fungi and suggest that chitosan may have potential as a stable material for testing variability in this response
