Passage 1: In Someone Else's Shoes

Business Owners want Customers buy more
They make less, only has financial success and failure. Tom bought a baseball glove when the Business failed but, "I play?"

Tom made back his cost to make it

Passage 2: The Industrial Revolution

Before the early 1800s, most people in the United States lived and worked on farms. They produced much of what they needed on their own. Some people worked in special trades, such as blacksmiths or weavers, and sold their products for a profit. This way of life was dramatically altered when the Industrial Revolution reached America. The Industrial Revolution brought major changes in manufacturing, transportation, and how Americans made money. Machines could now create products that were once made by hand, and big cities all across the United States became home to large factories. Cheap forms of housing were suddenly built throughout the cities in order to pack in the growing number of workers. Today, historians see the Industrial Revolution in America into two parts. Both parts bring new inventions, faster kinds of transportation, and a movement of people from the country to the city.

Because of conflicts with other countries in the early 1800s, the United States was forced to produce many of its own goods, and people began to experiment with new and faster methods of making products. By the mid 1800s, the United States had grown even larger and had access to more natural resources, such as coal and iron, that were used in factories and to create machines. Railroad projects
