MTS LAB: Relationships and Biodiversity BioBlitz Living Observatory

Relationships

Relationships between all organisms present the basis of ecosystems – an interconnected system that provides important benefits to humans. Citizen scientists can provide data to help monitor these relationships. Monitoring human impacts on ecosystems can help predict potential ecosystem health, measure biodiversity, and support decision-making.

Relationships that are often directly involved in ecosystem health are human health, for example, how temperature influences health. Human health is just one example of how directly we are involved in ecosystem health. Human health and relationships are:

- genetic relationships and evolutionary relationships for the diversity and adaptation of species to environmental changes and ecosystem dynamics, disease control
- use relationships for climate control when humans, as part of the ecosystem, are managing the temperature environment (greenhouse)

Program

During this program, students will learn the science behind ecosystems, witness how scientists use data to predict the health of their local environment, and participate in a BioBlitz.

Key Takeaways from the BioBlitz program:

• Ecosystems are complex systems that are interconnected and depend on each other for survival.

• Biodiversity is the variety of life in an ecosystem, and it is important for the health and stability of the ecosystem.

• Citizen science is a way for普通市民 to contribute to scientific research and help protect the environment.
