Concussion (Head Injury)

Concussion (Head Injury)

A concussion is a type of traumatic brain injury (TBI) caused by a bump, blow, or jolt to the head or body that results in the brain moving rapidly back and forth inside the skull. This sudden movement can cause chemical changes in the brain and sometimes damage brain cells, disrupting normal function.

Symptoms and Severity

The symptoms of a concussion can vary but often include headache, confusion, dizziness, nausea, and balance problems. Some people may temporarily lose consciousness or experience memory loss (amnesia). Symptoms can be immediate or may not appear for hours or days after the injury. Concussions are typically graded based on their severity:

- Grade 1 (Mild): Symptoms last for less than 15 minutes with no loss of consciousness.
- Grade 2 (Moderate): Symptoms last longer than 15 minutes with no loss of consciousness.
- Grade 3 (Severe): Any loss of consciousness, even for a few seconds.

Dangers and Treatment

While most people recover fully, any concussion should be taken seriously. Untreated or repeated concussions can lead to permanent brain damage. The risk is cumulative, meaning multiple concussions can have a worsening effect over time.

The primary treatment is rest—both physical and cognitive (mental). This means:

- Physical Rest: Avoiding physical activities, especially sports.
- Cognitive Rest: Limiting activities that require mental concentration, such as schoolwork, reading, and screen time (computers, TV, video games).

Prevention

Preventing concussions involves taking proactive steps to protect the head:

- Wear appropriate protective headgear (helmets) during sports and activities like hiking or skateboarding.
- Always wear a seatbelt in a vehicle.
- Ensure safe play environments, such as avoiding diving into shallow water.
