Government Reports Announcements & Index ,1996      Updating Searches for Systematic Reviews

Margaret Joan Sampson,2009 Introduction This thesis examines methods for updating searches for systematic reviews of healthcare interventions Systematic reviews endeavour to find and synthesize all relevant research as a basis for the practice of evidence based medicine They are more useful if they are complete and up to date Materials and Methods The sample was 93 meta analyses in allopathic medicine Newer randomized controlled trials RCTs were sought through MEDLINE searches and were assessed for relevance by physicians Two Boolean searches two similarity searches and one non database search approach were tested The Boolean searches were based on a simple subject search paired with a filter selecting only RCTs from Abridged Index Medicus journals or with the balanced Clinical Query The two similarity searches were Support Vector Machine SVM and a Related Article search of PubMed based on the three newest and three largest studies from the original review Main Results Clinical Query provided good recall but with large retrievals Abridged Index Medicus RCT had smaller retrieval sizes and lower recall but did detect many large studies The Related Article search showed the highest recall Recall with SVM was lower but retrievals were smaller RCTs that cited the systematic review being updated were also tested but identified only a small proportion of new evidence Relative performance of the test searches was consistent regardless of whether the intervention was a drug device or procedure All searches showed variability across clinical areas but Related Articles RCT showed the most consistency The pairing of Related Article RCT and Clinical Query gave excellent recall of new relevant material Conclusions Meta analysts can identify new evidence through a simple structured Boolean search paired with a related articles protocol By building on the evidence base formed in the original review related article searching may replace time consuming non database methods necessary in conducting original reviews
