age of the FLMs the division p 0 01 and departments p 0 02 in which the FLMs work and their levels of knowledge of the organisation s absence management policy and procedures p 0 048 This allowed the rejection of the null hypotheses and states that there is an association between these variables and levels of absence of the FLMs employees However there are also other interesting results that are of high practical significance despite the results not being statistically significant This includes looking at relationships between variables such as career history and relationships with other stakeholders when correlated with the absence levels of the FLMs employees The main results from the other research methods utilised in this study demonstrate that there is some ambiguity over responsibilities for managing absence and that absence management is not fully integrated into associated HR policies Despite attempts to implement best practice interventions there remain some indications of differences between rhetoric and reality Recommendations for the organisation include the need to include supplementary details in their absence management policy and to condense the seven existing documents into one comprehensive policy guide In addition the organisation needs to support their FLMs so that they understand exactly what their role in absence management entails and how and when they should work in partnership with other stakeholders
