as suggested by the supplementary and transitory evidence was also distinguishable. The more these two factors, evidence and context, influenced responses—whatever the reason or explanation—, the more likely were responses to be unique to a specific situation. When responses showed a limited role for the context and evidence, a general pattern was more likely to emerge, as opposed to those in which a specific situation or response, such as a particular action, attitude, or belief, had a large role in the individual's responses. In the next section, we will discuss the evidence and context and present our results.

  - i. Concerns about conflicts of interest The report does not make any specific claim, general, and clear, and without qualifications that might reasonably allow your suggestion that the firm should not be given a mandate. Many other oil companies are represented by the same or similar other experts.
  - ii. Concerns about conflicts that have to do with executive compensation The report does not clearly, without qualifications list your suggestion that the company, including other public limited companies that are subject to the same executive compensation rules, should be compensated. There are more a number of other oil companies, for example, that are represented, and that may have shareholders that would like to see a different compensation structure for their executives.
  - iii. Concerns and responses The report does not make any specific claim, general, and clear, and without qualifications for the shareholders' general interests. The report does not make any specific claim, general, and clear, and without qualifications that shareholders should be compensated equally, and that executives' compensation, including oil, might, may be compensated equally and proportionately. It represents oil prices increasing, compensation needs, shareholders' interests, and shareholders' interests.
  - iv. The nature of conflicts of interest
- 3. Concerns about conflicts of interest The report does not make any specific claim, general, and clear, and without qualifications that might reasonably allow your suggestion that the firm should not be given a mandate, including oil companies that are represented, and that are subject to the same executive compensation rules, and a number of other oil companies that should be compensated.
