Canada's Pioneering Experience with a Flexible Exchange Rate in the 1950s Michael D. Bordo, Ali Dib, Lawrence Schembri, 2007 This paper revisits Canada's pioneering experience with floating exchange rate over the period 1950-1962 It examines whether the floating rate was the best option for Canada in the 1950s by developing and estimating a New Keynesian small open economy model of the Canadian economy The model is then used to conduct a counterfactual analysis of the impact of different monetary policies and exchange rate regimes The main finding indicates that the flexible exchange rate helped reduce the volatility of key macroeconomic variables The Canadian monetary authorities however clearly did not understand all of the implications of conducting monetary policy under a flexible exchange rate and a high degree of capital mobility The paper confirms that monetary policy was more volatile in the post 1957 period and Canada's macroeconomic performance suffered as a result

Flexible Exchange Rates as Shock Absorbers Sebastian Edwards, Eduardo Levy Yeyati, 2003 In this paper we analyze empirically the effect of terms of trade shocks on economic performance under alternative exchange rate regimes We are particularly interested in investigating whether terms of trade disturbances have a smaller effect on growth in countries with a flexible exchange rate regime than in countries with a more rigid exchange rate arrangement We also analyze whether negative and positive terms of trade shocks have asymmetric effects on growth and whether the magnitude of these asymmetries depends on the exchange rate regime We find evidence suggesting that terms of trade shocks get amplified in countries that have more rigid exchange rate regimes We also find evidence of an asymmetric response to terms of trade shocks the output response is larger for negative than for positive shocks Finally we find evidence supporting the view that after controlling for other factors countries with more flexible exchange rate regimes grow faster than countries with fixed
