Baseball's Reserve System Neil F. Flynn, 2006 On October 8 1969 the St Louis Cardinals traded center fielder Curt Flood to the Philadelphia Phillies At the time of the trade Flood was thirty one years old at the top of his game and in the prime of his life In professional baseball trades are not uncommon What was different about this trade was that Curtis Charles Flood refused to recognize the right of the Cardinals to trade him to another team without his consent In doing so Flood challenged a practice that was designed and enforced by professional baseball owners for over eighty years a practice commonly referred to as the reserve system It was the late 1960s a decade of great racial tension and unrest the Vietnam War was dividing the country and now Curt Flood a black man was challenging the lily white major league baseball establishment On January 16 1970 Curt Flood filed suit in the Federal District Court in New York against major league baseball alleging that baseball's reserve system violated the Sherman Antitrust Act and Flood's rights under federal law Flood argued that once he signed a contract in his case when he was eighteen years old he was owned by this team for life and that the reserve system was tantamount to slavery Flood's decision to challenge major league baseball cost him his baseball career and much more Despite the U.S. Supreme Court's denial of Flood's claims and ruling in 1972 that professional baseball was exempt from federal antitrust regulation professional baseball players had free agency by 1975 This is the story of Curt Flood's case and trial against major league baseball and its aftermath
